

Our history

Kenya Embassy, Juba

The Kenya Embassy in Juba was established as a Consulate in February 2006, following the signing of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA) in 2005. Kenya was among the first countries to recognize South Sudan's sovereignty, having played a crucial role in the peace process that culminated in the signing of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA), which paved the way for the country's independence. In July 2011, at the Independence of the Republic of South Sudan, the consulate was upgraded to a fully-fledged diplomatic mission.

It is a bilateral mission that promotes Kenyan strategic interests in South Sudan. The establishment of the Embassy underscored Kenya's commitment to fostering strong diplomatic, economic, and socio-political ties with South Sudan. Over the years, the Embassy has played a pivotal role in enhancing bilateral relations, supporting peace and stability efforts, and facilitating trade and investment between the two nations.

Kenya has remained a strategic partner in South Sudan's post-independence journey, particularly in areas such as mediation and conflict resolution, capacity building, humanitarian support, and infrastructure development. The Embassy has also been instrumental in providing consular services to Kenyan nationals living and working in South Sudan, as well as strengthening regional integration through initiatives under the East African Community (EAC), Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD), and other multilateral frameworks.
